After the American Civil War, several native communities, like the Ute, took in black people displaced by the war, including orphaned children. They had little to offer but they opened their homes and integrated them in their communities and families.

"...Nevertheless, because those awarding the Nobel Prize are free from discrimination or intimidation, it is startling that in the explanation provided for the award no mention is made of the Western legacy of #Artemisia. To begin with, the very fact that the Prize was being awarded to a woman for a plant named after a goddess should have elicited at a sense of uncanniness that arguably deserved mention. Be that as it may, the failure to mention that Artemisia has a long history of being used medicinally in the West not only as an insect repellent but also to treat fever—a common symptom of malaria—is simply inexcusable."

Robert R. Mackey Cultural appropriation is a pretty flexible idea. Some are pretty easy to spot (ex: "Sexy Indian Princess" costumes, or the Redskins for Native Americans). Others, not so much. When any two cultures contact, both are changed. Hindu culture was massively changed by contact with Europeans, as it was with the contact with Islam before that. And all three cultures ended up borrowing from one another to some extent.

#pumpkin But then, an unlikely rescue. #humans began eating the wayward vegetables. As a new genetic analysis of 91 #Cucurbita species shows, squash were independently domesticated in several parts of north America, beginning about 10,000 years ago—right around the same time that their megafaunal dispersers vanished. It's not clear what exactly changed our minds on Cucurbita squashes—perhaps a few lucky strains had mutations that made them just a wee bit more palatable. Once the Cucurbita clan caught our attention, selective breeding took its course, and voila, rotund orange gourds that pair perfectly with cinnamon and sugar.'

How Ancient People Saved the Pumpkin from Extinction

The Great Pumpkin Shortage may have you grumbling over the price of mashed gourd this Thanksgiving, but if it weren't for our distant ancestors, America's favorite nutmeg latte scapegoat wouldn't even exist.

Rain has switched over to snow at Centennial Airport, Monument Hill, and Larkspur. There is mix of rain and snow at Buckley Air Force Base Airport. Be careful out there as roads are already snow covered at higher elevations of the mountains.

We should strongly consider shutting down the banks and oil companies that enable the funding of Isis to happen with sales of their oil at below market rate. That would a lot more impact than anything else.

Why 2016 could be shattering for Republicans

The election could be a tipping point, showing the strength of a growing left and the weakness of a shrinking right.

smog is really bad. The Chinese government has been taking very aggressive measures to curb the pollution. Cars with license plates ending in an odd numbers can only drive on certain days and even numbers on other days. Coal plants around the city have been forceably shut down. In an authoritarian country you could resort to such measures.

employees working within the city limits were required to pay their employees at least $12.25/hr. Businesses with more than 55 employees are supposed to pay at least $14.44/hr. The idea is that, by 2019, the businesses will be able to gradually adjust to having a $16 minimum wage across the board.

the demise of Carson's campaign will be an object lesson as to why successful candidates for high office never, ever deviate from the script. Ben Carson's current and upcoming experiences will ultimately inform why "disciplined" candidate Hillary Clinton always looks like a robot on TV.
